

Michael Sever
The Hebrew University

A source of uncertainty in computed discontinuous flows

Some recent results suggest that particularly in higher dimensions, admissible weak solutions of systems of conservation laws are in short supply. In particular, convincing empirical results may be compatible with boundary data insufficient to uniquely determine such a solution. A method is described for a posteriori computational investigation of this question.